The present invention relates to implantable leads for electrical stimulation of myocardial tissue. More particularly, the present invention relates to a capture or interface lead for connecting implantable cardiac electrical stimulator hardware to an intramuscular or extra-corporal electrode placed on the endocardium or epicardium of a heart. Implantable cardiac electrical stimulation devices, such as pacemakers, cardioverter-defibrillators and automated defibrillators, typically include a harness which electrically connects the stimulator to one or more intramuscular or extra-corporal electrode(s) situated on the surface of or within a wall of a heart chamber. The implantable cardiac stimulation device also typically includes a connector which is adapted to mate with a harness connector and is electrically connected to the electrode(s) to receive stimulus signals.

Electrode leads are used to deliver electrical stimulation signals to the cardiac tissue. In cases of heart failure, a number of electrode leads are used to deliver high energy electrical stimulation pulses directly to the heart muscle. Each electrode lead connects to a paddle-style electrode attached to the exterior of a heart chamber. The leads are implanted so that the tips of the leads rest in the endocardial surface of the heart, penetrating the ventricular myocardium as well as the interventricular septum. The electrode leads are used to interface the heart with an implantable cardiac stimulator. Although reliable, these leads suffer from several drawbacks. For example, the leads are relatively stiff and therefore can create potentially harmful kinks or wraps. Additionally, the leads have relatively large diameter and thus permit relatively little torsional movement of the electrode tip relative to the lead body. This can cause inconsistencies in delivery of electrical stimulation pulses. Furthermore, such leads are considered by many to be relatively uncomfortable for a patient to wear and as such
